Content

In this two-day class we will start by working on how to properly touch the head to get the maximum amount of information safely. This training will move palpatory skills another step forward, refining the quality of touch. We will go over the fundamentals of an anatomical and energetic understanding of one of the most delicate areas as we discuss how the head fits into the rest of the organism as the “eighth listening post.” The bulk of the class will be working on understanding and palpating the sutures and the cranial base along with how what we feel can be integrated into our practices. We will also learn the proper use a technique to reboot the systems and share some ideas about what this means in the context of Traditional East Asian Medicine.

Dozent

Dan Bensky, DO

Dan has a long term interest in Chinese and Chinese medicine. He also graduated with a Doctor of Osteopathy from Michigan State University College of Osteopathic Medicine in 1982, where he was a research assistant for John Upledger.
