Content

One of the most fascinating and useful results of applying osteopathic palpatory concepts to TEAM (Traditional East Asian Medicine) is the clear realization that the yin and yang organs described in our core texts are clearly connected to the actual physical organs and that these connections are palpable.

In this three-day class we will go over the living anatomy of the most important viscera, learn palpatory techniques to listen to them, and go over some ways to integrate this information into the practice of TEAM, both with acupuncture and herbal medicine. This next step in Engaging Vitality, this class will aid in gaining a more complete understanding of TEAM and its applications.

Prerequisites: Modules 1, 2, and 3.

Dozent

Dan Bensky, DO

Dan has a long term interest in Chinese and Chinese medicine. He also graduated with a Doctor of Osteopathy from Michigan State University College of Osteopathic Medicine in 1982, where he was a research assistant for John Upledger. He has studied with Jean-Pierre Barral since 1986 and table trained for him on numerous occasions. In addition to teaching for both professions, he has been working on utilizing the connections between osteopathy and East Asian medicine for over thirty years. Dan maintains a clinical practice in Seattle Washington.
